"It's almost finished," the traveller said as he tasted another spoonful. "But it would be even nicer if we added some onions and potatoes." The husband agreed. They washed and cut the onions and potatoes and dropped them into the pot!

Soon, the smell of the soup drifted out of the house windows and down the street. One neighbour followed the smell all the way to the house, where he heard them talking about the stone soup.

"Is the stone soup ready now?" the woman and her husband asked the traveller. "Yes, but it would be even better if we had some carrots and beans!" he replied. "I have some," yelled the neighbour who was watching from the window.

The neighbour, wanted to taste the stone soup, returned with carrots and beans. He put them into the pot.

The news about a traveller making soup out of a single stone brought many villagers out of their homes. They followed the delicious smell. "Is the stone soup ready now?" asked the villagers when they arrived. "Yes, but I remember having stone soup with chicken once," he replied.

I have chicken," said a farmer who ran home to get some. The farmer returned and placed pieces of chicken into the pot. After letting the soup boil, the traveller lifted the spoon to taste it. "Perfect!" he exclaimed. Then, he served a bowl of stone soup to every villager to taste.

"It's magic!" the villagers cried out, seeing how much soup he had made. "Delicious!" cried out another villager. "But where can we get a magic stone? Surely this one has been used up." The traveller shook his head and pulled the stone out of the pot. The stone was still whole! The villagers realized that the delicious and plentiful soup did not come from the stone.

The traveller drank the leftover soup and went on his journey. At last, from that day on, the villagers shared what they had with each other. And the village became a happy place.
